WHY MYCELIUM PACKAGING?

A large share of the packaging we use today protects products only for a short time, yet remains in the environment for decades.

Mycelium-based packaging is created by naturally binding organic waste-based inputs with fungal mycelium. It contains no chemical adhesives, petroleum-derived ingredients, or persistent plastics.

With density, form, and performance that can be tailored to specific needs, these materials offer a system that is protective and functional throughout use, yet able to return to nature at the end of its life cycle.

This approach transforms packaging from a temporary shell into a component of circular design.

For us, mycelium packaging is not just a sustainable alternative; it is a production approach that turns packaging into a conscious design decision—one that reflects a brand's values.

BEYOND FORM

Thanks to their natural structure, we can create products with curved, soft contours. This allows for a distinctive and organic design language with a unique aesthetic character—an approach that goes beyond standard forms.

BIODEGRADABILITY

BIOP products are made from materials that can fully break down in nature without leaving any trace. Thanks to their mycelium-based structure, they return to the soil and re-enter the natural cycle without generating waste. Each product is part of a sustainable life cycle designed to return to nature's own system.
